Our Brokerage fees, The type of services they offer, and the specific financial products you trade or invest in. Here are some common brokerage fees you may encounter:

1. Commissions: This is the fee charged for executing trades on your behalf. Commissions can be a flat fee per trade or a percentage of the trade's value.
2. Spread: In the case of forex and CFD (Contract for Difference) trading, brokers often make money from the difference between the bid and ask prices, known as the spread. You effectively pay a higher price when you buy and receive a lower price when you sell.
3. Management Fees: our brokerage firms charge a monthly fee for managing your investments. This fee is more common for managed accounts
4. Inactivity Fees: If you don't trade for a specified period, some brokers may charge an inactivity fee. This is to cover the cost of maintaining your account.
5. Withdrawal Fees: our brokers charge a fee when you withdraw funds from your account. This fee can vary based on the withdrawal method (e.g., crypto transfer, Wire Transfer).
6. Margin Interest: If you trade on margin, meaning you borrow money to trade, you may be charged interest on the borrowed funds.
7. Data Fees: Our brokers may charge for real-time market data or research tools. Depending on the broker, you may have access to free or paid research and analysis tools.
8. Exchange Fees: In addition to broker fees, exchanges themselves often charge fees for executing trades. These fees are typically passed on to the trader.
9. Account Maintenance Fees: our brokers charge fees to maintain your account or for specific services.
10. Currency Conversion Fees: For international trading, if you trade in currencies other than your account's base currency, you may be subject to currency conversion fees.
